LG has become the first major company to launch a location real-time tracing gadget – the Kizon – ready for parents to use.

Designed for pre-school and primary school children, the Kizon allows the child to call their parents' preconfigured number by pressing a button, or accept calls from their parents with the same button. If they fail to press it within 10 seconds the device will automatically let the caller listen in to the machine's built-in microphone.

Not everyone thinks it's such a great idea. Privacy group Big Brother Watch says LG must make clear how the device's security system guarantees no one other than the parent has access to the child's whereabouts online.

And it raises another question: at what age are you preventing your children from learning to cope on their own? "New technology has a way of throwing up parenting challenges that get right to the heart of the line between being responsible for your children and invading their privacy," says Justine Roberts, founder of a support site for parents called Mumsnet.
